"I've got a stone in my hands, and there's a crow in my mind! I fear myself. Painting is a treatment for my inner sicknesses. My childhood and adolescence era was passed with tramp and bombard through the war. It compassed me either with fear and anxiety through the lost youth, so surely it imported my (works) pictures, too. Humans and the tragedies they caused were portrayed with an aggrieved personality full of fear and anxiety with sharp colors and expressive expression, and steady scratch. They're full of fears, anxiety inside me, and the society..."

Monessa is my daughter, she seems unsure of her identity in a multicultural society . This work is part of a series of my ongoing body of works where I answer Monessa's question on what being black and beautiful really means. As I confront this question, tension is unavoidable, and I feel this when most people encounter this series of works

Globally it is estimated that up to 1 billion children aged 2- 17 years have experienced violence or neglect. According to UN figures, one in three women and girls experience some form of physical or sexual violence in their lives. The fear of violence is an everyday reality for women and girls. "Head shot" is one of the "Unbreakable Cracks". It is a series of works that bring awareness to domestic violence against women and girls. Ending violence against women and girls is a matter of justice. We have the power and the strength to stand up, speak up, and spread the word. Everyone has a role to play...

Art and Desire 01 and 02 are abstract paintings rooted in a visceral oscillation between beauty, sexuality, and desire. I use paint itself as a flow state in which each stroke, continuous, truncated, always unfolding and unfolding on itself, can be read as a meditation on the complexities of being human. The resulting work affords the viewer aesthetic pleasure in considering their own state of being in the world.

P. Elaine is a former Professor who received her PHD in Philosophy at the European Graduate School in Switzerland
